Outcome Mapping and Progress Markers for 2010-2014 Strategic Plan

This year, REPOA has been re-assessing its way of conducting business in response to recommendations made by various studies and reviews as well as the Board of Directors. REPOA Management has been developing a monitoring and evaluation framework which will focus more on outcomes and results as opposed to the previous which focused on outputs and activities. While the previous framework provides an opportunity for ensuring efficient utilisation of resources; the new one will focus on long term sustainable benefits for stakeholders.

REPOA is in the process of developing progress markers that will be used in devising strategies for achieving the intended outcomes and form the basis for outcome monitoring and evaluation. Progress markers will reflect movements toward outcomes which may not be realized immediately and form the basis for designing strategies for moving in the direction of achieving the envisaged outcomes.

The progress markers framework will be the basis for orientation of the strategic plan interventions towards achieving the overall goal of the plan and how these interventions will be monitored, the kind of reviews that will be undertaken over the period, type of evidence based evaluation studies that will be undertaken to show that the interventions have either lead or are leading to achievement of the intended outcome and finally how indicators and progress markers of the various interventions will be reported. So far REPOA has developed progress markers for stakeholder outcomes and will continue with the development of progress markers for the other outcomes. Progress markers have been developed for the media, NGOs, private sector, universities, local government authorities and central government.

Round Five Survey of Afrobarometer to kick off in October 2011

Joanita Magongo, Researcher

Afrobarometer surveys are aimed at capturing citizen's perceptions on how their countries are being managed within the context of economic, political and social aspects in order to inform democratic, economic and other development programmes. The surveys were done in selected African countries in Sub-Saharan Africa and are led by Ghana Center for Democratic Development and are overseen by the Michigan State University. These surveys were conducted in Tanzania in 2001, 2003, 2005 and 2008. Data sets and public reports in terms of briefs and papers were produced out of these surveys. Round five is scheduled to take place in 2011-2012 and preparations are ongoing. The planning workshop to discuss the protocol for the survey was held in Ghana on 6th -10th June, 2011. Prof. Wangwe and Joanita Magongo represented REPOA in the meeting. The round five survey is scheduled to take place in Tanzania in October, 2011. Previous Afrobarometer data sets and specific country reports can be accessed at www.afrobarometer.org

Supporting local government reforms through analysis of data from the 3rd Citizens' Survey (April 2011)

The main purpose of REPOA's formative research programme is to document the processes and outcomes of local government reforms, and to provide key stakeholders with operationally relevant data and analyses of lessons learnt during its implementation. This is done with the aim to promote informed dialogue among stakeholders to ensure that policy making is a consultative process.

In its third round now, the Citizens' surveys under the programme are carried out in six local authorities to provide primary data and information on impacts of the local government reform process to citizens.

This year saw further analysis of the Round 3 data from late 2009 being published in the assessment of the degree of fiscal transparency in local authorities. The publication assessed the extent of fiscal transparency in planning, budgeting, budgetary transfers, implementation and audits of accounts. Overall it was established that there have been modest increases in the extent to which local government authorities share information but challenges remained with voluntary sharing of information on various aspects of local government activities and finances.

REPOA Training

From January to June REPOA conducted two training sessions for researchers including Training Workshops on Exploratory Data Analysis: Using STATA and Research Report Writing Skills.

Training Workshops on Exploratory Data Analysis: Using STATA

The objective is to provide practical guidance to beginning researchers on how to use data analysis as a tool for discovery, i.e. getting ideas from the data (hypotheses seeking). The focus of the training, therefore, is on exploration, not inference, i.e. getting ideas from the data (hypothesis searching). The training was attended by 14 participants (6 men and 8 women) from Universities.

Changes to the Grants Application Process

As a result of a review conducted last year, slight changes have been made to the application process. In the past, REPOA accepted concept notes for research grants throughout the year. From May 2011, the grants department will only be accepting concept notes submitted in response to a Special Call for Proposal, which will be advertised in local newspapers, through the e-brief and on REPOA's website.
